Facing the future: tackling drugs in the new decade – preliminary programme

We have entered a changed economic and political landscape. Cuts in public spending are underway with the expectation that services will need to do 'more for less'. The 'localism' agenda will likely see a shift in decision making from central government to local communities. The rise in the use of legal highs has led to calls for a review of the Misuse of Drugs Act and for faster responses to new and emerging drugs.

How will wider economic and political changes impact on drug policy? Will we see more attention paid to tackling alcohol misuse? Will drug and alcohol crime and health policies draw closer together? What are the risks and potential opportunities for the drug sector?
